Lung metastases from solid tumors in many cases develop into osteolytic or osteoblastic bone metastases. Spontaneous regression of osteolytic bone metastases or spontaneous reduction of serum alkaline phosphatase activity is common, but a prompt response is rare. The osteoblastic bone metastases are believed to be mainly related to osteoclast activation and osteoblast stimulation. Both spontaneous and induced osteolytic bone metastases have been reported to be of the low grade fibroblast growth factor (FGF) type. High-dose interferon (IFN) has been reported to have a potent inhibitory effect on bone metastases, and this inhibitory effect was demonstrated by a dramatic decrease in the serum alkaline phosphatase level in some patients. Newer drugs, such as zoledronic acid and denosumab, also have been found to have a potent effect on bone metastases. While the evidence for high-dose IFN is still anecdotal and needs to be confirmed in large trials, the newer drugs show promise for the future treatment of bone metastases.
